Primary, Secondary & Tertiary Sources

A primary source in law is defined as the actual statement of the law from the creator such as court, legislature, executive agency, or President or governor.

A secondary source is one that interprets or analyzes the primary source. Examples are a law review or journal article.

A tertiary source is one that provides an overview of a topic such as an encyclopedia.

Finding Court Cases, Laws & Codes

LexisNexis provides access to full text court decisions and state and federal laws and regulations. Limited access to international law resources is included. Use the Shepardize feature to track all cases citing a particular case.

Research a company and discover recent cases involving the company as well as information on patents and trademarks.
